There are a number of procedures that online gambling companies have in place to ensure that they do not generally receive too many complaints, or that at least they are kept to a minimum. Let's take a look to see what online casinos are doing to help provide a smooth level of service and prevent complaints being made.

Generally, the first thing to do is to contact the online casino directly in writing through their customer support section, with email being the best way of doing this because it keeps a clear record of correspondence. If you use the Live Chat function, you will most likely be asked to file your complaint via email anyway, though if you can't find the procedure anywhere then the agent will either refer you to their 'How to make a complaints' section or list the steps that you need to take, so live chat can be a short cut in that regard.

When making decisions about complaints and disputes, the ADR has a process in place which they are required to follow, although each provider differs in a number of ways. There are some that have one official who is responsible for making the overall decision, while if the decisions are more of a complex nature this then reverts to a panel. This panel is required to consider all of the evidence that has been gathered by the case manager. There are other providers who offer a service of mediation as opposed to adjudication, where the provider will make a decision dependent on the evidence submitted by each party.

This can be a common problem for customers in the gambling industry. Some online casinos can take a long time to process withdrawal requests, and this basically happens because the casino can get away with it. Sometimes it is beneficial for them to hold money for as long as possible to make their accounts look favourable over a certain period. Because of this, when a customer makes a complaint about withdrawal durations, the casino will often process the transaction straight away as they do not want to attract attention to their creative accounting. To cover themselves, online casinos will usually have a disclaimer saying how many working days that customers can expect to wait for withdrawals to complete.

What is important to note, is that customers can choose not to refer to the ADR provider and have the option to go straight to the courts if they wish and should feel that the matter warrants this. Ultimately though, this can be a more expensive option for the customer and there are no guarantees that the case will go in their favour.

Of course, refusing to pay out could also mean that the casino is trying to cheat its players by withholding payouts using flimsy excuses or cancelling them altogether. It is important to play in a licensed casino, preferably a provider that has a license from the UK or Malta, because they have very strong player protection and check the casinos regularly. Casinos which do not abide by the rules lose their license.

Essentially, the gambling operator is required to have a written procedure when it comes to handling customer complaints and disputes. This must feature all of the necessary steps that a customer has to take to make a complaint, and this is by order of the LCCP social responsibility code provision. The initial step of the resolution process requires the operator to try and resolve the complaint by themselves whether this be online or in their premises.

In many cases, being refused a payout is the result of a casino misunderstanding. For example, if you play with bonus money then it is tied to bonus terms and you cannot simply cash out winnings from bonus money without satisfying them first. Be sure to read the bonus terms and, above all, the wagering conditions, because only when these have been fulfilled can you have your winnings paid to you.
