The first two clauses are clearly irrelevant to partaking in card games over the internet, but the third may come into play depending on whether or not the images that appear on your screen are regarded as cards and whether or not a computer counts as a gambling device. In the definitions section of Chapter 47 (47.01), a few examples of gambling devices are given, including roulette, video poker, and keno, and it seems that this wording targets the kinds of machines one would encounter in a casino that are specifically manufactured for use in real money gaming. Your personal computer wouldn't count as a gambling device under this commonsense interpretation of the law; however, we can't say definitively that this is the way TX authorities to casino you texas online does play allow would view the situation. Similarly, in our opinion, the word "cards" means actual pieces of cardboard or plastic that contain the familiar suit and rank symbols that we're all acquainted with, not virtual representations of those items. Again, it could be possible that local police have a different understanding of what cards are than we do.
