The character of the design problems, the operations and methods of presentation are selected with these ends in view. For example, the use of the ruler, tracing and transferring of designs is advocated, where freehand drawing would be used in regular school work. This is desirable since it is necessary for the pupils to use these operations in their vocational work. Dictation, as a method of presentation, is employed, since it is valuable from the standpoint of class discipline, in unifying action, necessitating concentration and the following of verbal directions, eliminating useless movements and operations, thus saving time and energy, all of which makes for efficiency. This lesson is utilized in the sewing class by enlarging design in free hand machine quilting of pads. PART II Application of Design Principles to Dress WHY place so much stress upon the subject of dress in its design relations. If the problem would settle itself automatically, in its economical, ethical and esthetic relations to life, without over emphasis in any of these directions, we might be content to allow the whole question to rest in the realm of the intuitions. If we fondly imagine this to be the situation we have but to take a trip down Fifth Avenue and across Fourteenth Street, New York, or the corresponding thoroughfares of any city or town, examine a few fashion sheets and advertisements, take a little journey through the shops, observe with unbiased mind, and our disillusionment would be complete to the verge of dismay and disgust.
