Online education is more popular than ever. There are more universities than ever offering degrees like the popular online MBA. But with so many MBA programs to choose from, how does one know how programs stack up against each other? Some of the first qualities to look for in a business school offering an online MBA is how convenient and easily accessible it makes it for its program candidates. Most business schools all request the same admissions elements from applicants: a resume, transcripts, recommendations, and work experience to name a few. While the GMAT has long been a measuring stick for business schools to gauge a graduate student's potential success, many programs are nixing this requirement during the application process.
