While it may not be advertised or listed among the supported options when you go to either fund your account with Australian currency or cash out, some real money online casinos will make PayPal available upon request. In most cases this is only for withdrawals into one's PayPal account, and will be offered (or not) entirely at the operator's discretion.

It is the second rule here which leaves Aussie punters on a sticky wicket, as it effectively eliminates PayPal as a deposit/withdrawal option for a huge number of online casinos, real money poker sites and other avenues for virtual gambling on the Net.

The PayPal company is worth more than 50 billion dollars. It is clear that the service of the popular e-wallet is not free. As with any ordinary house bank, PayPal charges for services used. These are always borne by the recipient of a payment, unlike other e-wallets, where the remitter often has to bear the transaction fee. This has the advantage in online shopping that the burden of fees usually lies with the store owner and not with the customer. In the PayPal online casino, the situation is somewhat different. Here, deposits are free of charge for the player, but when withdrawing the winnings, fees are incurred, usually 1.9 percent of the amount of money plus 35 cents. There are special conditions for micropayments, donations, or merchants
