Our Online Gambling News section focuses on newsmaking iGaming casinos as well as the news that affects them. New licenses, distribution partnerships, game debuts, rebranding, new launches, and relaunches are among the items you will find on these pages. Most stories carry more than a single area of interest, so you can often find overlap with other sections such as M&A, Jackpot Winners, the Player's Lounge, and Gaming Industry News to name a few.

The section gives online industry veterans and players the ability to share common interests as well as participate in the comments together. It's also a great place to see the evolution of many land-based interests as they explore iGaming opportunities in US states with regulated online industries.

Look for emerging sportsbooks and lotteries as well as seasoned and newer operators partnering with legendary land-based casinos.

Bonuses are one of the biggest reasons players flock to US online casino apps. Unlike their land-based counterparts, online gambling sites can offer generous cash incentives for newcomers due to lower operating costs. And when it comes to bonuses, players at US online casinos have it better than anyone else in the world.

Online casino us news

The online gambling scene in the US is not without its problems: The number of states where the activity is legal and regulated is still very limited. Players do not have access to the wide variety of gaming options as those in other parts of the world. But bonuses are one segment where US online casinos are doing a great job.

Those who have played at non-US sites probably know that claiming bonuses is often a double-edged sword. While getting the extra money is appealing, there are many potential traps along the way.

So, why are those playing at regulated US casinos in a better position, and what are the primary advantages of these bonus offers? It comes down to three main points:

Trying to regulate the online gambling industry is a challenging task. On the one hand, regulators try to protect the players. On the other, over-regulation can have an adverse impact on the overall gaming experience, so it is a difficult balance to strike.

When it comes to bonuses, more clarity is always better, as players need to be aware of all relevant terms and conditions. Regulators across the US require online casinos to make all the details readily available and very concise so that there is no confusion.

This may feel natural to those who have only ever played on regulated sites, but it is anything but. Many lesser-regulated operators will hide bonus terms or make the language such that it is open to interpretation, allowing them to cheat their customers.

Casino online us news

There are also great resources to understand more. Here at pokerfuse, we have reviews for all major US online casino operators and we explain bonus terms in clear terms. For example, pokerfuse's best online casinos US page has a section on every operator's sign-up bonus, and individual review pages like the BetMGM Casino review breaks down the welcome bonus in further detail.

Wagering requirements are one of the reasons why experienced gamblers often avoid bonuses altogether. Having to play through the bonus funds dozens of times before being able to cash out is hardly an appealing proposition. On top of this, many casinos will bundle your own money with the bonus, basically forcing you to play.

Us news casino online

There is no such pressure with US operators. In fact, wagering requirements offered by the leading brands are miles ahead of most non-US sites.

For example, the BetRivers Casino MI deposit bonus features a wagering requirement of just 1x (we've called this "best casino bonus in the US" for good reason), while BetMGM Casino requires players to play through the funds 15 times.

Us casino online news

This is significantly better than 30x, 40x, or even 50x required by many casinos in other international or local markets.

Another reason why some players do not enjoy bonuses as much is the fact they restrict them from playing games they like. In many cases, casinos will go as far as to confiscate players' funds if they play a game that is not on the approved list.

News online us casino

When it comes to regulated US online casinos, these restrictions are much lighter. While certain games may not count towards wagering, you will never have your funds taken just for making a mistake. And, the list of restricted or limited games is usually quite short.

All in all, while it may seem like international casinos have better bonus offers, this is generally not the case. Their offers may appear bigger and more generous, but upon a closer inspection, US casino bonuses are much more valuable.

In the U.S. some players in Pennsylvania who were previously self-excluded from online gambling are finding access to land casinos in the state cut off as well.

Many safe online sites offer a host of user-activated responsible gambling tools from time-outs and cooling-off periods, to deposit limits and loss limits, to outright self-exclusion.

The decision to gamble or to use the most robust responsible gambling tools should never be taken lightly.

In the first case, a player has to be ready, willing, and able to lose their stake without counting on a financial return – it's risky business and most often results in a loss.

In the second case, the most drastic self-help tools like self-exclusion can result in unknown consequences including losses even if the player wins.

With over 10,000 online casino brands and perhaps thousands of operators, it's not always readily apparent if an internet gaming venue has sister sites – it can be even less evident that a gambling exclusion at one site will activate a ban across all of the operator's properties.

To determine that, a player has to be willing to roll up their sleeves and dig into the casino's Terms & Conditions or find the site's Responsible Gambling Policy.

Since there is no central global database of this information, the only other option is to read reviews written by trusted gambling experts.

This becomes even more important considering the fact that most online operators don't do their due diligence on players until it comes time to pay out.

A self-excluded player could deposit multiple times without review. Still, when it comes time to verify their identity in order to get paid, their personal data could trigger an investigation or even immediate account closure.

In 2019, at Star Casino in Sydney, a significantly disabled patron won a jackpot of $285,000 on a slot machine. A friend helped him place his bets but the player's card, decisions, and risk were all his. The casino decided not to pay the jackpot because his friend had self-excluded at the casino in 2016 and wasn't supposed to be on the property, let alone running a machine.

A judge has found in favor of the player, awarding him the win plus about $35,000 in interest on the money as well as the player's legal costs.

The winner had no reason to think his friend was banned and the friend didn't mention it because he had been enjoying unfettered access for at least 6 months.

In his ruling, the judge said, "The whole of the economic stake wagered during the operation of gaming machines by [the friend], whilst [the winner's] card was inserted and he watched and gave [the friend] directions, was [the player's] money."

He concluded, "Accordingly, [the casino's] failure to pay the winnings ... was misconceived and breached the contract of wager between the plaintiff and the defendant."

In the U.S., the state of Pennsylvania has been regulating casinos since 2006. The state's excluded gambler list has over 10,000 names on it. Online gambling was liberalized there in 2017 and launched in 2019. New self-exclusion lists were developed for casinos and eventually, sports betting. Pennsylvania's iGaming exclusion list has almost 2,000 names, according to a post in PennBets.

Online gameplay can be much faster than land-based gaming so the risks and rewards can be extrapolated as well. On the downside, players can lose money faster and they can lose more of it if they are impulsive and don't have constraints in place.

The Pennsylvania Gaming Control Board (PGCB) doesn't automatically ban players from land casinos who have self-excluded online. However, many of the state's 16 land casinos do not make differentiation and ban players across the board.

So far this year, seven players have petitioned the PGCB requesting to have their online exclusions lifted so they could play at brick-and-mortar casinos where the pace is slower and they have not requested exclusion.

Five were denied earlier this year and two more in August. While these seven players took the process to its ultimate conclusion, many others have simply given up without going through all the steps. Each of the players banned themselves from online gaming for one year, five years, or for life.

Oddly enough, as long as you look old enough to be gambling, casino managers do not request to see ID from players coming onto the casino floor to gamble – just like online casinos don't check your ID when you deposit. Unfortunately, any significant win could require the players to show ID and their wins would be denied – just like online casinos might do if you self-excluded from a sister site.

Us online news casino

After a bad session, many online players close their casino accounts and sign up for another one. In the process, they might say something that gets them on an exclusion list when that was never their intention. To avoid that, players can simply zero out the account balance and then ignore the site in the future.

If you ever experience difficulties or think you might, players should avail themselves of all the responsible gambling tools at their disposal but the ultimate act of self-exclusion should be considered as carefully as the decision to gamble in the first place – based on knowledge, not emotion.
